

May 2026

MAY I PLEASE GET SOME PEACE

This month has been an absolute clot of complexity and self-burning useless stress. As the days progressed, I felt more and more drained by... substantially nothing. I blamed thesis work, but within me I know that that didn't check out. I had a lot of work to do, yes. Not because I needed to, but because I could make that extra, final, step to finalize the work of 4 years with a conclusion worth my value. I did spend many hours in front of my laptop, working hard to feed my rationality with the fruits of my potential. But, and with the benefit of the hindsight, that just don't make it for all the misery I suffered. I gave up on most of my physical activities to allow my body to rest, and yet I've felt the most tired since a long time. I spent time at night or in the weekend to finish all, but I also wasted hours and hours just panicking around, in an stunning state of overwhelming feelings. The best and most recurrent metaphor I have is that of an electrical resistance, taking energy from the system to convert into wasted thermal energy to be lost in the vast of the universe. My brain really felt thrown into a whirlwind of thoughts, fears, plans and counterplans, feelings, and confusion. Complexity is a immediate word when thinking about this behavior. But that complexity that really leads you nowhere. Similar to those debates led only for the sake of discussing,

New Picture!

"Who the hell is that guy", I would probably have said a few years ago looking at this. I have too much hair, so I am picking up on my beard instead.

WHAT IS THIS?

In what it seems like a flagellant joke, I decided to start a self-made newspaper-styled montly report of my life. Because my perilous writing skills are only second to my ability to artistically design stuff; so rather than achieving something. And within myself I many times screamed --- with the loudest thoughts I could produce in my mind --- the extension of the enervation I am feeling. The closer people in my life probably had enough of hearing me saying this, but I am so tired of keep living like this. When I talk of changes, I do it due to the exasperation I feel with my current conditions. When I talk about doubts, I do it due to the turmoil that dominates my mind; with also a huge consequence of guiltiness, because all I can do is being unhappy of all the beatiful things that I have here and now. I am indeed blessed with some of the most precious people in this beatiful messed up world, and yet all I can do is look over to glance at the unknown. That same sweet cruel unknown that once led me to my true being, at the cost of countless tears shed by the people that cared for me the most, myself included. And it really feel like my heart is not made to settle. In times like this, I get inspiration from a friend of mine. She, in her most genuine and autentic self, is a seeker of life, and this the is memory she gifted me with. It was a warm March night in Ghent. Darkness was well settled, and the bar was located in a narrow street, with soft lights only coming from the main street. We sat inside, where the light was even more softer than outside --- coming only from the many warm candles placed in the tables. The place was small, but packed. A general warm and familiar feeling was present within the room. It was Back with my pottery classes.

But one month after lol.

The bottom of that bowl felt into pieces together with my ego.

this might be the best chance I have to remind myself of how much I suck at things. And because self-deprecating attitudes are quite common nowadays, I will also allow some of my close friends to remind me of my gruesome skills by sharing these pages with them.

loud all around, but my ears were all hers. We were talking about life. Those big talks that I live for. We, both, were about to face changes. Me, going to London the morning after; and her, soon to be flying to the other side of the planet to chase love. My guts felt unsettled, as words were dancing in our mouths. She had a way clearer view of life than me in that moment; and to my question "what is that you want from life", she said "I want to taste it all". I doubt this description honor the value of that answer, in that specific situation. I recall this memory now, because as I feel the guiltness for my lack of gratitude that seems to stop me from settle, I just remember that what I am looking for is not something unreal or unachievable; but it simply is the real and diverse taste of life. That perhaps I, as her, am just looking to experience all the different many shapes and faces of life that are out there, before my spirit would be finally sated and wise enough to know where to alight on. And in that sense, I sometimes -- in those rare moments of clarity -- look at this spiral of grueling unsettlement I am living now with gratitude and satisfaction, as this is truely a condition of life and humanity that I am living at its fullest.

I got back into drinking!

Guess the thesis stress is not helping. But I'd like to blame good company on this one. As for that bottle, the taste of that night willl remain for years to come in my soul.

I planted tomatoes!

I did so to make my Nonna jealous. She gave up on cultivating her tomatoes in the balcony, so this is my tentative convincing her that plants are cool by showing her mine.

...

She's not happy about that, and she is cursing my plants to die and fail.

If this is it

It don't fit

But I'll grow into it

If this is real, why do I feel like I'm faking it?

Faking it -- Olive Krug

Latte Art!

If only I could make those every day... I can make one of these once a month, if I'm lucky.

Cynicism isn't wisdom

It's a lazy way to say that you've been burned
It seems, if anything, you'd be less certain after everything you ever learned

Cynicism -- Nana Grizol

"Have you ever wished to conntect to everyone's mind in the globe, and broadcast a loud and clear 'fuck you all' ?"
"Mmh, that's not nice of you."
"I am not a nice person."
"People say differently"
"People do not talk to you as much as I do"
"What's wrong?"
"I just feel so tired"
"Tired do not usually make you wish to broadcast negativity"
"Well, it does now."
"What have you done lately?"
"Nothing."
"So what are we tired from?"
"Existing?"
"You're to young to say that"
"It does not help that my body and mind are in a constant fight against... Everything"
"Everything?"
"Yes! You know what I mean!"
"Of course I do, but go on"
"A fight for and against all I do and have."
"Not right yet..."
"For and against all I could do and could have..."
"Here you go"
"..."
"... .."
"So what now?"
"What do you mean?"
"What do I do with this now?"
"I don't know. Maybe write it in your newspaper."
Conversation with myself.

Eggplant plant in my terrace.

I also planted this to make sure I would get something to lure my nonna with. When she saw this picture, she was absolutely livid. I didn't tell her I bought the plant with the fruit already on...

It's baking season!

Worst case, if my cafe will not succeed with coffees, I can always live of focaccia baking.

MY MUSICAL MONTH WRAPPED

This will be the monthly list of songs I added to my Spotify playlist.

- Put a Light On -- Generationals
- Foreigner -- The Wild Reeds
- Judgment -- The Wild Reeds
- ME PROBLEM -- EHLE
- Like a Bi#%! -- HOUSE OF SAY
- Faking It -- Oliva Klug
- Little Wind -- Haley Heynderickx, Max Garcia Conover
- Drop -- Connor Price, Zensery
- Ayan's Song -- Haley Heynderickx
- Nolan Ryan -- Hoodie Allen
- As Long As I Still Get You -- Vulfmon, Evangeline
- In the Wee Small Hours of the Morning -- Woody Goss

DISCLAIMER :)

This text has been entirely written by humans. Any generative AI has been intenionally avoided. The natural consequence of this choice is the raising of imperfections all over the document. Imperfections are among the most human things I know; and they surely are a pure indication of my deepest and core being. In a world where technology is taking over all of our human functions, it is our own responsibility to step back and enjoy the slow, dull process of creating things by ourselves.